Georgian London Britain has not always enjoyed rabies-free status, and there were several outbreaks in London during the 1750s. Dogs were commonly used to protect property and also for fighting, so snapping, snarling canines were not an unusual sight on London's streets, but between 1752 and 1759 Londoners were always on the alert for dogs (and people) with running eyes and salivating mouths. 10 dangers of Georgian London - HistoryExtra Hello, Sign in.
